Root/Main Issue

How might we encourage employees to ensure they receive recognition and increase engagement within the company?

The Problem: Employee Retention and Engagement

65%

Leave Due to Lack of Recognition

Gallup reports that 65% of employees leave organizations due to a lack of recognition and appreciation.

31%

Lower Turnover with Recognition

Organizations with effective recognition programs experience 31% lower voluntary turnover rates (Deloitte).

33%

Cost of Employee Replacement

Replacing an employee costs 33% of their annual salary (SHRM), emphasizing the financial and cultural urgency of retention.

These statistics highlight the critical need for effective employee recognition and engagement strategies. Benevity aims to address these challenges by providing companies with tools to recognize and reward employee efforts, especially volunteering, to improve retention, morale, and productivity.

Digging Deeper: Root Cause Analysis Using 5 Whys

Why are employees not logging their volunteering hours?

Employees don't perceive logging hours as important or immediate, so it gets deprioritized.

2

Why don't employees perceive logging hours as important?

Logging hours feels detached from their day-to-day work and lacks visible benefits or immediate feedback for their efforts. It feels like a redundant task.

3

Why does logging hours feel detached and lack feedback?

There is no habit-forming trigger or easy way to log hours integrated into their existing workflows, such as communication or HR tools.

4

Why are there no triggers or seamless integrations in place?

The platform was not initially designed to meet employees where they already are (e.g., Slack, HR analytics, or other routine software), so it remains a standalone task.

5

Why was the platform designed as a standalone task?

The original focus was on compliance and data tracking for leadership rather than on creating an employee-centric experience to drive daily engagement.

How Might We Solve the Problem? – Strategy

Our strategy is to foster a culture of appreciation and purpose in organizations, addressing critical retention challenges through innovative, employee-driven solutions. By integrating volunteering rewards with productivity tools and HR analytics, we not only solve current employee disengagement but also anticipate future trends in employee-centric workplace innovation.

Target Customers and Their Needs

HR Directors & People Ops Leaders

Seeking integrated solutions to improve employee retention and engagement metrics while demonstrating ROI

Fortune 500 Employees

Looking for meaningful ways to connect with their workplace community and contribute to social causes

CSR Program Managers

Needing tools to streamline volunteer programs and measure social impact across organizations

Delivering The Message: Why Is This Important?

High attrition results in cultural disruption and financial loss. Employees who feel valued and appreciated are significantly more likely to stay and thrive, contributing positively to the company's bottom line.

Risk Agitation: Concerns for Benevity

1

Perceived Low ROI

Fortune 500 companies may prioritize cost-effectiveness. If they perceive limited return on investment from employee engagement programs, they might reallocate funds.

2

Budget Constraints

Economic downturns or company-wide cost-cutting measures can lead to reduced spending on non-essential services.

3

Limited Employee Adoption

If employees are not actively engaging with the platform, the company might consider it underutilized and reduce its budget.

4

Competing Priorities

Companies may prioritize other HR initiatives, such as DEI programs or leadership development, over CSR platforms.

5

Insufficient Differentiation

If competitors offer similar features at a lower cost or provide better integration, Benevity's value proposition might be questioned.

6

Lack of Integration

CSR and employee engagement initiatives may be seen as separate from the company's core objectives, leading to budget reallocation.

Existing Case Study: Recognize App and Habit-Based Engagement

Background: Recognize App integrated peer-to-peer recognition within Microsoft Teams and other workplace platforms. The system encouraged employees to acknowledge colleagues' achievements and contributions that aligned with company values, establishing regular engagement through simple, meaningful interactions.

Result: The habit-forming recognition feature led to increased adoption of other app functionalities, including work anniversary celebrations and survey participation. This successful engagement pattern provided a framework for expanding into volunteer hour tracking and community impact measurement. (View case studies at here and Recognize.)

Volunteering as a Catalyst for Engagement

A study conducted by Volunteer Match and United Healthcare demonstrated that employees who participated in workplace volunteering programs reported stronger connections with their companies and peers. By tying volunteering to other activities, like recognition or incentives, companies saw increased employee engagement. Employees who initially logged in to explore recognition features often began tracking their volunteering contributions, creating a ripple effect of broader platform usage

Application for Benevity

1

Promote Peer Recognition

Begin with promoting a peer-recognition culture within Benevity to increase employee interaction with the app. Employees receive badges or micro-rewards for recognizing their peers' efforts.

2

Link Recognition with Volunteering

Gradually link recognition with other app features by rewarding users who log their first volunteering hour after consistent app usage for recognition.

3

Celebrate Achievements

Build on this habit by celebrating milestone achievements, such as recognizing the most active volunteers monthly.

This approach not only encourages employees to adopt the platform but also builds a seamless path from casual engagement to meaningful participation in volunteering activities.
